My Dear Macmillan,

Blunt tells me that it was in the letter of instructions from the Society it was stated that the thirty pounds for his home journey was to be sent to my account with the Ottoman Bank. The money has not yet been remitted (in fact I understood that it was to be paid to him in London). In these circumstances, as he must have money for his home journey, I have taken the liberty of applying the thirty pounds for the month of December to the other purpose. That money is now not needed for its special purpose, and I feel sure that the Society will pardon me for diverting it unauthorised to a ~~near~~ different object. Without using it, I cannot give Blunt the means of going home, so that the
